

Michael Cooney's Cash on Delivery is a farce about lies, damn lies and excuses – with some surgical stockings, an insane washing machine and lots of mistaken identities thrown in for good measure.

It tells the story of a day in the life of Eric Swan, who lost his job and hasn't told his wife. Without really meaning to, he started getting benefits and allowances for non-existent lodgers and their relatives.

And then the Man from the Department drops by...

This relentlessly funny play careers along from situation to situation, each funnier, more contrived and more unlikely than the last.

Alongside Eric are his loving wife Linda, his extremely dodgy Uncle George and Norman the lodger. Through the door come the DSS man, the sexual relations counsellor, the undertaker, the bereavement counsellor, the scary hard-line feminist and Norman's fiancée. Not forgetting the washing machine.

Mixing all these together guarantees an evening of non-stop laughs for the whole audience.
